A week before my 30th birthday I decided to return back to school to further my education. I had been working for a neurologist for a year and wanted to be a medical assistant. So I went to Sanford Brown College and spoke to a counselor. I was very impressed with the effort and time that they took to make sure that you were a serious contender in the future of your education.

My first day at Sanford Brown College was scary, I remember sitting there in a chair, looking around and feeling overwhelmed. Soon that feeling subsided when my teacher, Miss Ouri, walked in the room. She introduced herself and made us feel welcome.

As time went on we lost a few students and we gained some new ones. We met and had new teachers. Everyone was basically there for the same reason and that made the time that we spent at school worth it. You knew that you were there to learn and the teachers were vested in your success.

I graduated in May of 2008; I went on to sign up for and take my certification test and passed it in January of 2009. I am now proud to say that I am a Certified Medical Assistant. My everyday job duties include drawing blood, giving injections, taking vitals, triage and rooming patients and calling in medications. I am also able to assist the doctor and nurse practitioner in procedures such as lumbar punctures, Botox injections, orthostatic vitals, and different aspects of neuro testing.

To any one that is in the process of pursuing new goals or thinking about furthering your education, Sanford Brown College was a great choice for me and it could be for you.
